History of the EITC?
The Origins

• 1972 Family Assistance Plan, modeled on the negative income tax, fell apart. Key opponent (Senator Russell Long from Mississippi) instead proposed EITC.

• The desire to maintain structural racism in the labor market was a significant factor. As Representative Phil Landrum, a Georgia Democrat, noted: “There’s not going to be anyone left to roll those wheelbarrows and press those shirts.”

• Opponents to FAP ended up proposing and supporting the EITC – deliberate prioritization of work

Expansions

• Expansions of the EITC were favored over expansions to the minimum wage, with EITC pitted against minimum wage.
• EITC broadly supported by both Democrats and Republicans (compared to other benefits), as well as businesses, employers, tax prep industry.
• Recently, growing view among conservatives that EITC is a form of welfare ("Lucky Duckies")
Initially, EITC receipt was effectively automatic for those completing tax returns

This changed in the 1990s

Following 1990s expansion, the emerging view that EITC recipients were “Lucky Duckies” influenced the program’s administration – i.e. increased auditing
Current Problems with the EITC
Low Take-up

• 78-80 percent
Confusing for Eligible Populations

- Concealed within the tax system
- Design is so complicated it causes lots of errors (but even those who receive it erroneously are still low income)
- Audits (1/3 of IRS audit resources directed towards EITC)
How to move forward
Making the EITC more Accessible

• Draw on existing administrative data
• Auto enrollment
• Simplify the design
• More outreach
